Kaplan's research draws on a wide range of sources, including Freud's own writings, the case notes of Hans's father, and interviews with Hans himself as an adult. She shows that Freud's interpretation of the case was based on a number of errors, including:

- Freud's assumption that Hans was afraid of his father's penis
- Freud's failure to consider the role of Hans's mother in his development

- Freud's reliance on Hans's father's biased and unreliable reports

Kaplan's book is a major contribution to the history of psychoanalysis and child development. It offers a new and more accurate understanding of Baby Hans's case and challenges some of the most fundamental assumptions of Freudian theory.
