Smith begins by arguing that Christianity has been the foundation of Western Civilization for centuries. He argues that the Christian faith has provided a moral compass for Western society and has helped to shape its values and institutions. However, Smith argues that the Christian faith is in decline in the West. He cites a number of factors that have contributed to this decline, including the rise of secularism, the decline of the family, and the rise of political correctness.

Smith also argues that the rise of political correctness is contributing to the decline of Western Civilization. He argues that political correctness has stifled free speech and has made it difficult to have open and honest discussions about important issues. Smith argues that political correctness has also led to the rise of a culture of victimhood, in which people are constantly looking for ways to be offended.

Finally, Smith argues that the decline of the family is also contributing to the decline of Western Civilization. He argues that the family is the basic unit of society and that it is essential for the transmission of values and traditions. However, Smith argues that the family is in decline in the West. He cites a number of factors that have contributed to this decline, including the rise of divorce, the decline of marriage, and the rise of single-parent families.

Smith concludes by arguing that the West is in a state of decline. He argues that a number of factors are contributing to this decline, including the erosion of Christianity, the rise of political correctness, and the decline of the family. Smith argues that if the West does not take steps to address these factors, it will continue to decline.
